Okay, so this next one, this one can work against a mandible strangle or a fully locked strangle. Okay, so sometimes you have a mandible strangle, you feel like you can't thumb post the strangle arm, we can go to support arm instead. Or if you feel like there's no thumb post at all because you have your neck completely exposed, then you go to support arm instead. Okay, so let's look at this. So this time we come through, you get to a fully locked strangle, whether it's here or whether it's here, and this time from here, I feel like there's no thumb post. This time I can reach back and I can thumb post to my partner's tricep like so. Now as she goes to bring that strangle grip into place and she goes to lock her fingertips over her bicep, I can attempt, okay again, this is very low percentage, I can attempt to push my partner's hand up and over like so and separate the fingertips and the bicep. So when she goes to lock that strangle in, she'll start strangling, I just kip, kip, kip, kip, and as my head moves across the body. So what I want to do is I want to circle my head in one direction as I push the arm over in the opposite direction. So she goes to lock up and from here we come across and now again we're halfway into one of our escapes, okay. So this one you can do if you feel like you have a mandible strangle and the thumb post isn't working on the strangle hand, you can go to the support hand or if there's no thumb post at all on the mandible strangle because of the fact that it's underneath your jaw, you go to the support hand. And from here we can go in, we can catch a V grip like so and we can move our partner's arm out and over the way, out and out of the way. Now Sonny asked me to do a live one to see if she can strangle me versus my thumb post. So on three we're going to see if it works against little Sonny here. Ready, one, two, three. That's a win. That's a win for me. Okay so it does work but understand that it's like, I'm not going to show you this move and be like wow, you know, no one can ever strangle me again. No, if they lock their hands they're most likely going to finish you. But understand that instead of just giving up and conceding the tap or going unconscious, there are some things you can be doing from here to escape.
