All right, second option to get him to the floor right away. I'm going to enter in the same manner. This time I'm trying to lift his leg right away. So this works very well if you cannot dump him right away. You feel you don't have the weight on him to keep him, to get him down. Then this way you can always finish, go in, double, he sprawls out, lift up the single. Now from here, I try and get this up right away, step over, get the leg up as high as I can. The higher the leg goes, the more he'll be out of balance. So if the leg is low, it's easy for him to move, to defend. The higher I get the leg, as you see, he's going to start jumping right away. I need to keep him off the cage because the moment he gets back to the cage, he has a second thing to base on and it's going to be a lot harder to get him down. So single, lift up, so I'm taking him off the cage right away, step over, lift this up high, as high as I can so he is out of balance. Step behind the foreleg, take him down and I'm here in the open guard again, starting to attack. So if he defends the other side, boom, boom. From here, lift, take him off the cage, step over, pull this up right away. Out of balance, hook the foreleg, put him down, fight from here. So the important thing is, lift high, hook the foreleg, put him down and keep him off the cage.
