So that was a nice entry from De La Riva. Now we're gonna look at shin on shin. This is one of the most common guards in nogi grappling because a lot of people use that to enter into their leg locks, to attack their heel hooks. And it's a very common guard, you see it a lot. The benefit of this guard from our perspective as a guillotine attacking top player is that there are no frames in between us and their head is off the ground. So it's a perfect position to set our guillotines up. Let's look at that in practice. So Josh is playing shin on shin here. Look at how his head is off the mat, it's below my head. All good checks for our guillotine checklist. It's just his head is on the inside. So just like with a single leg, we need to pop it to the outside. And now it's a very easy way to get into the guillotine. So I like to pop the head to the outside, I catch. And again, I fall to my butt with my leg posted here. So I don't fall all the way back, I don't go here because there's a lot of space for him to escape from. I just fall to my butt and I post my foot out. So he goes for shin on shin. I pop the head and I sit to my side. I keep this leg posted. If he decides to come up, easy switch into the bottom knee on belly. And again, if he stays lying down, I'll just go to the mount. Just like with the DelevalGuard, it fits all of our characteristics for a good guillotine from top. Head of the mat, no frames in between. And our legs are loose enough to jump around and get the finish. Let's look at that from a few different angles. Let's look at that from a few different angles.
