So now we're going to move on to a collar drag and a collar drag is basically an arm drag but instead of using our partner's arm to pull it across their body we're going to look to use a cross collar grip. So we go and from here I'm grabbing my partner's gi maybe I tried to grab the tricep but my partner's maybe disengaging. This is a really good position to look to attack if our partner's knees are back a little bit exactly like maybe I wouldn't be able to be close enough to butterfly sweep my partner he's a little bit further away from me then I'm in a little bit better place to be able to attack the collar drag because if I go for the butterfly sweep it might be hard enough for me to get close enough to my partner to get underneath their center of gravity. So from here I have a hand on the collar right away I'm going to post my hand on the mat my foot's going to go to my partner's knee my other knee is going to be stepped up from here I'm going to pull everything to the side and throw my hips down so the camera we're here post the hand everything goes to the side and we're throwing our hips down very similar to what we were doing with the arm drag basically the same movement except we have a grip in our partner's gi so we go post leg comes to the outside my other foot is kicking at my partner's knee to change his base and we come to the side from here right away I like to reach over the back post my hand do a technical stand up and come to the top of turtle so we go set a hand in the collar post our hand to the mat my foot goes to the outside from here I'm going to kick at my partner's knee to the side turn my base over and get to the top one thing that may happen from here is because my partner never wants to expose his back to me sometimes when I go for a collar drag and I do a really good job of it as I'm turning my base over my partner might concede the top position he might go down to his guard so that he's able to better defend himself from me attacking his back sometimes they'll just concede the sweep there rather than trying to fight out of it so you'll see that with this next one so we go and it's as I come to the side once I've already almost gotten to the top my partner's just going to go to his back and try to establish a guard so we post our hand foot to the outside kick as I'm turning my hips over my partner turns his back to the mat because now he has a guard in front of me protecting him from me attacking his back that's another situation that you can run into there I would say it's pretty common at least you know 30 or 40 percent of the time the person is a little bit worried that you're going to attack their back so they're going to concede the top position and so you can be ready for that as well
