Now we're going to talk about the armpit step using the arm razor, which is really what you want to do because I love doing the arm razors from the North-South Matrix. You have a lot of torque, your arms aren't locked in there, you have a very high likelihood of finishing, they have a very low likelihood of escaping. So this is the armpit step using the arm razor. The arm razor is great for setting up the leg separators because from here I'm going to now, same thing, step over here. I feed my arm razor right here, okay? And what I'm going to do is I'm just going to step and sit right here as I pull and the leg separator is in. If you notice, I landed here. As I tilt left, I'm going to pull myself forward and see I take the slack out of the arm using the arm razor. So I take the arm razor slack out, I pull it kind of towards there far leg and then I lock it to my hip as now I lean back, separate it and make it straight. So one more time. So we're here. Sometimes you could even begin to feed the arm razors this way here, but from here you have the Gregorian face away. So I would kind of probably do that one right there, okay? But let's say you were here, you pulled it through here and you just stepped over right here, okay? You put a lot of pressure on them, on their grip. Would you sit this way? Look from here, I'm going to use this to rock up, see how that slack came out. Hip, lock, separate and make it straight. One more time. To break it down so you can practice it more slowly, look, I have a Kimura grip with chest pressure. I'm framing his head as my right knee goes to his back. I'm going to step over here. My knee drops here. I'm going to pull my left lapel out. I feed the razor, keeping it bent, feed it through here. I'm going to just step right there, right at his belt line as my knee opens. Even if they have their grip right here, as long as you can get your feet here, this will force him to re-grip from the outside in. And from here, pull myself up, taking the slack out, leg separators in, phew, separate, making it bent, keeping it bent, making it straight. All right, guys, so use the arm razor with the armpit step. The arm razor is going to make your arm locks unstoppable, especially when you do it from the north-south matrix.
