All right the next finish I'm going to show you guys is the high elbow guillotine from bottom cross. Okay this is not something that I recommend that you go for on purpose but this is more so like if you are getting put on the bottom cross you miss the leg to try to trap your partner in your guard and they start to pass now you can still finish if you have the proper setup. Now what I mean by the high elbow guillotine is when I come across here and I drop my form over top my partner's back. Okay now you don't have to drop it here in the beginning what you can do is keep it to your side and as your partner starts to maybe come around right you can raise it up now he's going to come all the way around come all the way around and then you have your finish. Sorry it's a little bit hard for me to let go in that position but as your partner rotates around your body that other forearm is going to continue to block across your partner's neck he cannot defend like he would if it was a normal guillotine. A normal guillotine or what the traditional guillotine would be I'm here I just have my forearm in his neck he starts to come across my body right and then his arm is over top of me and now he can you know work to defend this very easily right there's not really a strangle here but the difference is I'm all the way across my partner's neck I've lassoed all the way across his neck and my forearm is an extension of that lasso across his back so as I get here he starts to come all the way around yes his arm can't get over so as he continues to drive into me and now I have my finish. This acts as my basically my barrier from him to get all the way up but also is part of the strangle itself so if you ever get caught in the position it might be from standing it could be from the knees or the front headlock where they start to you know maybe a little bit faster than you or they're a little bit more developed in the wrestling game and they come around if you're coming over top that shoulder they can never get this arm back over to defend with and that's what they need to defend that guillotine okay so keep that arm over their back and then just hold on all right even if they pass they're gonna strangle themselves so a different angle here I get to this position I search he starts come all the way around boom and now you have a really devastating finish okay from a very uh not great position technically but if you have that grip you're totally fine you just have to keep your connections okay so that is the high elbow guillotine from bottom cross
